VICTORIAN STARTUPS SET TO TACKLE GOVERNMENT'S BIG CHALLENGES

The Andrews Labor Government's startup procurement program, CivVic Labs, today announced the successful startups selected to deliver solutions to some of the most pressing challenges facing government.

Six new startups have the potential to secure almost $1.1 million in contracts and will develop solutions in infection control, safety in the gig economy, Aboriginal cultural renewal and more.

The Department of Health and Human Services has selected social impact startup Good Hood to develop a chatbot that translates health advice for culturally and linguistically diverse communities.

Study Melbourne will work with Mentor Match to build a mentoring tool pairing international students with members of Victorian Rotary Clubs to combat social isolation.

WorkSafe Victoria, who will return to the program for a second time, will partner with My Safety Bot to address rising safety concerns in the gig economy.

AI startup Civability will help the Department of Environment, Land, Water and Planning uncover new ways to measure liveability across the state with an open platform capturing and mapping citizen voices.

In partnership with Sustainability Victoria, the Department of Environment, Land, Water and Planning will also work with surplus food marketplace, Yume, to help Victorian businesses minimise waste.

Finally, People Environment Culture Pty Ltd (PECU) will work with Aboriginal Victoria to create a living, breathing view of Victorian Aboriginal culture through augmented reality. The project will help Victorians young and old see the state's history through new eyes.

CivVic Labs, led by LaunchVic in partnership with the Victorian Government's Public Sector Innovation Fund, was established to provide startups with greater access to government procurement opportunities.

To date, startups in CivVic Labs have secured $1.8 million in funding since the program commenced in 2019. For more information visit civvic.launchvic.org
